FROM FATHER PHONG

There is still one more load of laundry left to do, the whites. The two dark colored loads had been sorted and put away. Doing laundry for me is therapeutic. No thinking. No anxiety. No worry. But a mindless simplicity of habitual motions. I have failed to understand, however, why my heart breaks out in joy when all the socks are fully paired up. Perhaps it is my existential angst or, in a fancier theological jargon, my transcendental nature unceasingly longing for togetherness, for union, for peace and tranquility.

The owner of a restless heart I am. A deadly commingling of perfectionism and inferior complexes. I guess, now that I am nearing sixty years of age, I should stop blaming my mother for passing onto me her genes. I should really be accepting accountability for my incessant worrying and the immature impulse to have everything under control. But isn't it a truth that blaming others is as old as dirt itself? Heck, aren't I or--better--aren't we in our everyday existence often behave a little like Adam blaming Eve and Eve blaming the serpent? Perhaps herein lies the cause of all wars and violences and injustices: a refusal to accept one's fault and the denial of one's sinfulness.

Lent calls us to go back to the core of our being, to go deep into the heart, to go beyond the flesh and the bones so to reach the center of our soul. Stop the blaming game. Stop the outwardly pointing of the finger. Stop the tongue from spitting words of untruth. But, embracing the spirit of the prodigal son, let's strike our breast and confess the Mea Culpas. Abstinence from meat and fasting from food are really only baby steps of the Lenten journey. The meat of the real conversion to togetherness, to union, to peace and tranquility is the unceasing utterances of mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa...

An abbot was asked to travel to another community of monks to preside over a trial of one of the brothers being accused of a wrong doing. Unable to decline the invitation, the abbot set out on foot shouldering a bag filled with sand. The bag, however, was holed. With every step that pulled him closer to the monastic community, the abbot kept on speaking softly to himself: my sins are running out behind me and yet I am going to judge the sins of my brothers.

I remember this tale from Thomas Merton's little book, "The Wisdom of the Desert." I gave the book away when I left parish ministry, went back home to live with my parents and began working as an itinerary preacher for the world's poor. Somehow, among the many stories that Merton had collected and written down, this is the only one that remains in my memory. I remember this tale only perhaps because I am the abbot and the community of monks and the accused brother. I am in every sinner. I am in every accuser. And with God's grace and a lot of God's assistance, I desire to be in every transcendental being.

I need to run downstairs to retrieve the last load of my laundry, even though it is close to midnight. More importantly, before I close my eyes, I need to put my heart, my mind, my soul, my tongue, my hands, my feet, my everything into the washing machine - heavy load setting, hot water and with bleach added to the strongest of detergent. I know that if I put my everything through the washer of Calvary, with the Mea Culpas on my lips, I shall be transfigured - together and united with God in everlasting peace and tranquility.

SHALOM, FATHER PHONG

I have worked at Saint Clement for almost forty years. Years ago, Saint Clement was one of the most populated, vibrant, and financially stable parishes in the Archdiocese. Over the years, the demographics in the Medford/Somerville area changed; families moved to the suburbs and over time Saint Clement Parish declined.

I have been committed to be the "Shepherd of the Parishioners' Money" for a long time. At times the future looked bleak, but a financial miracle always seemed to save the Parish. We were comparable to the Wedding of Cana...the jug of wine just never ran dry! Luck was running out, and rumors of closing were the inevitable.

Then, we received confirmation that Saint Clement would become the first Vietnamese Parish in the Archdiocese. The day I met Father Phong, I saw my first glimmer of hope that Saint Clement would survive once again. I have not been disappointed.

I want to welcome and thank the new parishioners of Saint Clement. I am so grateful and appreciative of your faithfulness, your time, your talent, and your treasure that you so willingly share with Saint Clement.

I know in my heart that great days are ahead and I look forward to watching Saint Clement grow and thrive once again.

With gratitude, Mary Jane Hough, Business Manager
